*Globalization and the Music of the Public Spheres

Keith Negus

In this chapter I trace the movement of sound across various global spaces and public spheres and suggest some of the ways that music moves beyond simply being a form of aesthetic expression or commodity to become a medium of transnational communication and affective knowledge. My point of departure is with the self-proclaimed "global" strategies of the recording industry and the responses that these have aroused, both inside and outside the music business in Europe. I take this as a concrete focus to begin interrogating some of the abstractions and universalisms of arguments about globalization. I argue that what has so often been termed as "globalization" is, when examined more closely, a series of very particular cultural movements, corporate strategies, and political strategies. These are certainly crossing over space and time and across nation-state boundaries, but they are not quite as "global" as many corporate commentators and academic theorists have suggested.

* I thank Annabelle Entwistle-Abdumamad, Fabio Piumin, Johannes, and Philip Tapp for their encouraging comments, sensitive criticisms, and useful suggestions in response to an earlier draft of the chapter.
